What would you do for love, especially if your lover promised you the world? Would you compromise your integrity by adopting bad habits displayed by your lover as those of your own? Would you drink alcohol? Would you smoke pot? Would you lie to your friends and family? And would you become involved in a scheme to rip off unsuspecting people of their hard-earned money?

In “The Things We do for Love,” 25-year-old Carrie Parker found that she would do all these things and more when the love-of-her-life walked into her workplace in search of a security system.

He said he was an entrepreneur, but what Roy McAllister really was, was a conman and a smooth-talker with the ability to get whatever he wanted. When he met Carrie, he decided he wanted her. But what he wanted her for was not to settle down and start a family; he wanted her for sex and to bolster his male ego.

Roy and his partner, Duane, are pot growers and together they have cultivated a strain of marijuana that will make them rich and enable them to leave the country and spend the rest of their lives under the sun in Central America. But in order to grow and harvest their plants they had to borrow money from a very unscrupulous source. And when their crops become infested with plant-eating insects, they turn to Carrie to help them raise the money to pay back their investor.

Roy wines and dines Carrie and tells her he loves her. And when she falls hopelessly in love with him, he confides in her and asks for her help. She gives Roy and Duane the names and account numbers of customers who have paid for internet and personal property protection by hiring her company, Watchdog Security, to prevent scams and intrusion, so they can break into their accounts, steal their money, and deposit it in an offshore bank account.

Their plan seems to be working but time is against them. And when their investor kills one of Roy and Duane’s drug dealers and threatens to kill them and Carrie and her family too if they don’t come up with all the money by the end of the month, Carrie has second thoughts and develops a plan of her own.

Thievery and murder and feelings of remorse are more than she can handle so Carrie does what she must to right the crimes and protect the ones she loves most.
